

Regarding Harsh Words from Billy and the Plejarans

by Michael Horn

I wish to address a concern shared by a number of people regarding the often harsh articles and information by Billy Meier and the Plejarans available at: <http://www.andyettheyfly.com>.

My point of view is that the Plejarans have been equal opportunity offenders going back for almost three decades. People need to read the available Plejaran/Meier material in order to see what they've had to say about much of the rest of humanity, most of it is quite critical. They have described the negative and warlike machinations of many different countries and individuals, many times announcing events before they occurred.

Neither the Plejarans nor Meier can be said to have any vested interests of a political, religious, economic, military or other nature in our world though Meier, as a citizen of this world, is certainly entitled to his opinions on any of these matters. The irony is that Meier, hailing from Switzerland, the land of neutrality, may actually be getting a hard time also from his own country for publishing those opinions.

As for us, we Americans are notoriously lacking in self-reflection and appropriate self-criticism, we seem to often prefer flag waving, screaming and attacking rather than determining if unpleasant things widely expressed about us are indeed true. If true, we should be about the business of correcting them. This isn't the way the painfully immature, and potentially enormously self destructive, "we're number one!" mentality operates but it's time to grow up and get away from our entertainment centers for a while if we're interested in long term survival. Substituting the endless watching of sports and reality shows for reality itself is proving to be a poor choice, in my opinion.

(As an exercise in objectivity, when looking at criticism directed at America, or whatever country of which you are a citizen, substitute something like "country X is accused of..." or "country x has perpetrated the following acts..." and see how you would evaluate or judge the actions if you didn't allow your own identification with your country to prejudice your thinking. The same exercise applied to one's own actions is a very sobering experience.)

So, if what Meier and company are saying is true...then we're in for a hell of a bad time as a country and one largely of our own (or our government's) making, which is exactly what many Americans don't want to hear anything about. Too bad. I'd rather know the bad news and fix things, as I said before. There seems to be some kind of subconscious belief, of epidemic proportions, that being Americans makes us always right, better than others and immune from the laws of cause and effect which we recklessly disregard. Perhaps people in other countries also hold those points of view though there seems far less evidence that it is either as virulent or widespread a contagion as it is here. The Meier material is also quite clear that other states/peoples such as Iraq, Israel and Palestine, and their leaders, are also culpable and present an enormous danger to world peace. It's simply their point of view that our government poses the largest, most ominous threat.

And, while many people in America don't like the criticism of American policies and actions by Meier and the Plejarans, they also complain about how/why the world at large appears to hate America, something which only substantiates what Meier has been saying. The same complaints against America voiced by people in other countries is also being voiced by many Americans seeking to correct policies which contribute to such hate towards us. Unfortunately, to make sure we're hated even more, it now looks like we'll launch the first of many unprovoked wars of aggression unless we, the people, prevent it. It should be obvious that blatant aggression, leading to only more retaliation and terrorism, will not make it safer for us at home.

Neither the Plejarans nor Meier are politicians or diplomats, meaning they're not trying to influence people with sweet talk and lies to get their hands on your wallet or seek any other type of advantage over us, as I've stated before. They are clear and frequent proponents of telling the truth as a rational form of self interest since lying only postpones, and often badly compounds, the consequences that must inevitably be faced.

It should also be said, though it may surprise some people that not everybody associated with Steelmark, or even with the Meier material for that matter, necessarily holds all of the same views expressed by Meier or the Plejarans. And, of course, it doesn't take an extraterrestrial or a Swiss man to hold these, or opposing, views. My position in representing the material in the case is that with the impeccable, irrefutable accuracy and credibility of the material provided to, and then by, Meier for almost 30 years, perhaps the help that people often wish would be given to us "from above" is right under our noses after all. The fact that we don't "like" what we're being told should be irrelevant to evaluating its accuracy and implementing its suggestions if we find them to be in our true self interests, such as survival at the very least.

It is hoped that vigorous debate and exchange of opinions, with the focus on core, spiritually based, life-supporting principles will lead us to right thinking and right action. So, I am grateful to those who put forth the challenges that initiated this response.
